FOOD-GRADE

This movement favours beauty prods made with ingredients you can eat. The concept? Your body absorbs what goes on your face, so the more natural your make-up, the better. Cult brands Bite Beauty and 100% Pure are on board, and model Karlie Kloss is a fan. "If you can eat it, then it's probably OK to put on your skin," she says.

CAMERON DIAZ

AYURVEDIC

Based on the principles of traditional Hindu medicine, Ayurvedic-inspired buys feature formulas designed to balance the body. Skin types are identified as Vata (dry and cool), Pitta (rosy and warm) or Kapha (oily and smooth), and are treated with targeted herbal formulas. Earthy babes Jennifer Aniston and Cameron Diaz are supporters of the trend.

GLUTEN-FREE

It used to be only peeps with an allergy or intolerance who avoided cosmetics containing gluten, but the popularity of the gluten-free diet has seen the demand for these products grow. Miley Cyrus and Miranda Kerr are down with the trend, as are brands like Hourglass and Physicians Formula.

KOREAN MULTI-STEP

If your idea of skincare is simply soap and water, you might want to give this one a miss. In Korea, 10-step and even 12-step routines (involving everything from cleansing oils to paper masks and more) are considered a serious investment in your appearance. They're now trending globally, thanks to the glowy complexions of sexy celebs like Jamie Chung.

OLIVIA WILDE

VEGAN
With the focus on ethical eating growing, it makes sense for the cosmetics industry to follow suit, producing vegan skincare and make-up. Beauty brands like Pacifica and E.L.F. are leading the charge, with products free of animal testing or animal-derived ingredients. We reckon A-list vegans Lea Michele and Olivia Wilde would approve.
